

Sinclair Broadcasting's decision to force their stations to air an anti-Kerry documentary days before the election is a clear example of the dangers of media consolidation.

Sinclair uses the public airwaves free of charge, and is obligated by law to serve the public interest. But when large companies control the airwaves, we get more of what's good for the bottom line and special interests, and less of what we need for the good of the general public. Instead of something produced at "News Central" far away, it's more important that we see real people from our own communities and more substantive news about issues that matter.

Sinclair's actions show why we need to strengthen media ownership rules, not weaken them. We need to protect our freedom to hear the truth, rather than be given information that serves the goals of large companies and corporate America. They show why the license renewal process needs to involve more than a returned postcard. Thank you.
